Negotiated practice: An anthropologist's perspective of hospital palliative care

The majority of Canadians spend their last days, and die, in a hospital. Increasingly these patients have some interaction with palliative specialists, or at minimum clinicians who use the principles of a palliative approach. Examining palliative care as a “culture” – a set of complex social practices – can help us to better understand how clinicians shape and collectively negotiate the experiences of dying, as well as the challenges they face within these institutional settings. Based on 10 years of experience, the conversation will be grounded in examples from local and international research.

Dr. Marian Krawczyk is an anthropologist and post-doctoral fellow with Dr. Rick Sawatzky at The Centre for Health Evaluation and Outcome Sciences. Her funding is jointly provided by Trinity Western University and The Canadian Frailty Network. She has just returned from a visiting fellowship with the End of Life Studies Program at the University of Glasgow.
